WHAT CONSTITUTES AN ENGAGEMENT? A WATERING-PLACE HISTORY .- The feuilletoniste of the Courrier des Etats Unis, in his last "Chronique de New York," after asserting that the present season has produced little but common-place events, (banalites) gives the following romantic watering-place

I know a young man (though the history does not belong to the present season) who found himself engaged one fine morning, without any idea of such an event. True, he had flirted a good deal for a week or more with a beautiful young blonde, whom fashionable pleasure had attracted to Saratoga, Newport, or Sharon, as you will. The name is not of the slightest consequence.

Flirtation, which is not expressly prohibited in the Decalogue is a sentimental coin fully current in the United States, and its circulation compromises no one. It the truth must be avowed, it had chanced that our bero one night-one moonless night-enjoyed a conversation at the extremity of a dark piazza; and this young gentleman, by accident, perhaps, dropped his head at the moment the young lady in question raised bers, the better to hear what he said. But a kise, half-given and half-received, is not a matter of such moment as to require the sanction of

Be it known, then, that William (I see no impropriety in calling him William) was petrified rather than charmed, the next day, when his partner of the previous night's interview, asked bim, bluebing, if he thought it best to make known their engagement at

He gave her a look from which the young lady inferred that she was not understood, and blushing still more sweetly, repeated the question.

William exhibited no discourteous surprise but put on an appearance which indicated that he was undecided whether an immediate public avowal was best, and then managed to have some good reasons for postpoing the revelation until the close of the season; and THE RICHEST PHOSPHATIC GUANO Nelly promised to keep it a profound secret.

That night he retired to his room and meditated various schemes for extricating himself from his embarrassing position. He could admit every plan but one-that of mar-

He had not decided upon any definite plan when next night, at the dance, Miss Susan II-, a charming person, who honored him with a friendship bordering upon the sentimental, touched him lightly on the arm, and said with a mysterious air: "Sir, I congratulate you."

"Wherefore?" he asked, but she had already glided away in the dance.

The matter required an explanation and during a biatus in the music they went aside and Susan epeke in a serious mood: "Nelly is my best friend; she has told me all. Oh, you needn't blush so at that." In fact William colored with the idea that his pretended engagement had already been circulated among his intimate frinds. He did not directly deny it, however, but took a method of his own. "Am I really engaged,?" he demanded of "A beautiful question to ask me,' said Susan, with the slightest touch of spite. "You shall judge my case," said William. "Suppose I repeat here what you have heard a hundred times-a thousand times-that you are beautiful, intelligent and accomplished; that your eyes are the deep blue of heaven; your lips the transparent red of the coral; wing; your neck the grace of the awan, and olders the whiteness of his plumage -would all this, I ask, constitute an engage- Farming community. ment between us?" "No, certainly."

"And if I should add: The musican loves you for the melody of your voice, the painter sculptor for the model of your-of your arms, the poet for the expression of your glance, the unfortunate for the goodness of your heart, the gay for your wit, and I love you for all "Is it true that you have said all those pretty thing to ber?" "It is not true. I could not have said it without falsebood?"

"And you never lie?" "Never. If I make such an avowal, does it follow that we are to become man and wife?" "I do not think so."

"Neither do I. For example, if upon just such a night as this, I take your hand (the taking of the hand was more than a supposition) and say to you: 'Susan! do you not know how long I have loved you? Have you not divined it in my words, felt it in my SUPER PHOSPHATE OF LIME. silence, seen it in my looks. Then, do not wait, accept the offer of my heart, which beats only for you; of my life, which has no other object, if I may consecrate it wholly to your happines-?" "Oh, shame! shame!" suddenly cried a voice stifled with emotion. The two retreated precipitately, seeing poor

Nelly, who also burried to her chamber to hide her disappointment and her fury .-Disturbed at the disappearance of her supposed affianced, she had walked out on the dark piazza, hoping to meet him, and arrived in time to hear his gallant speech. "Heay! What will she think?" exclaimed Sosan. "The truth!" replied William.

The next morning at breakfast everyone was asked, "Have you heard the news?-William has broken his engagement." But they were deceived; for in three months he married Miss Susan II ----, and the happy pair are now in Italy.
